

Tudor 517 W. Magee Street

Dating back to 16th century England, the Tudor architectural style was popular in our country in the 1920s and 1930s and continues to be a mainstay in suburbs across the United States. The defining characteristics are half-timbering on bay windows and upper floors, and facades that are dominated by one or more steeply pitched cross gables. Patterned brick or stone walls are common, as are rounded doorways, multi-paned casement windows, and large stone chimneys. This house features a classic swooped entryway, a stone quoin surround arched door, radiating front stairs and a cowl at the top of the chimney.

This home is historically know as the Herbert Whipfili House and was built in 1936.
