

Victorian 115 W. Arnold Street

Victorian architecture dates from the late 19th century, when America was exploring new approaches to building and design. Advancements in machine technology meant that Victorian-era builders could incorporate mass-produced ornamentation: brackets, spindles, and patterned shingles. The last true Victorians were constructed in the early 1900s. Contemporary builders often borrow Victorian ideas, designing "neo-Victorians." These homes combine modern materials with 19th century details: curved towers and spindled porches. This house features a bay window, lattice work, scroll work pediments, fish scale siding and corbels. The exterior stairs to 2nd floor is not original.
